The illustrated talk continues the series looking at the history of the Otago Medical School.

In spite of an era that included two world wars, an influenza pandemic and economic recession, medical and surgical advances continued. The medical school intake increased, teaching was improved and research was more soundly established.

Alumni and staff made significant contributions in many areas. These included the introduction of new methods of managing war injuries, and assisting (Sir) Howard Florey and (Sir) Hugh Cairns in the first field trials of penicillin.
