A library-bus tour of the suburbs

Erik Olssen's Building the New World, published in 1995 from the University of Otago History Department's researches into the Dunedin suburb of Caversham, established new directions in academic history.

THIS Bulletin, marking the honours bestowed on Professor Olssen this year, offers a brief introduction to material relating to various Dunedin suburbs. The coverage can only be nominal. The Hocken Library contains much literature—such as the encyclopedias of 1905 and 1998, McDonald's Dunedin; a Century of Civic Enterprise, and the tramway histories—relating generally to the boroughs and suburbs. The Pictures Collection, represented here by a single pencil sketch, has dozens of suburban images; the Photographic Collection, also represented by one example, has many hundreds. And there is no room for any of the numerous maps, town plans and sale plans.

Much information, on everything from sports clubs to women's organisations, can be found in Hocken Archives; but even this is too diverse to list in detail. Users are invited to consult the computerised catalogue headings, where they will find Archives material on: Andersons Bay (78 items), Caversham (115), Green Island (38), Halfway Bush (12), Kaikorai (56), Maori Hill (31), Mornington (53), North Dunedin (69), North East Valley (43), Opoho (24), Pine Hill (21), Ravensbourne (80), Roslyn (57), St Clair (41), St Kilda (33), South Dunedin (94), Vauxhall (7), Wakari (30) and other named localities. Check on these, too.

Lack of space also means the exclusion of Port Chalmers, the Otago Peninsula, Mosgiel and other outliers in what has become a greatly enlarged Dunedin. Even the following selection of books and booklets, taken off a data-base to be published more fully next year and relating to the contiguous urban suburbs, is necessarily incomplete.
