About the paper

SOCI310 introduces students to a key sub-discipline in sociology, namely social movement studies. On one hand, the paper challenges students to engage theoretically with forms of political action that occur outside of formal institutional channels. On the other, it addresses some of the practical realities that are involved in everyday resistance.

What have former students said?

'The content is interesting and class has a good atmosphere with students comfortable participating in class discussions.'

'It was a subject that I entered with not much interest or knowledge and I feel like that has completely changed and I am much more engaged.'

'Created a positive learning environment with enough of a work load to ensure the course was beneficial but not so much that it was continually stressful.'

'I loved it, don't get behind though or it's super overwhelming! And start your essay as early as possible, I gave myself a fortnight but it was not enough!'

For more information contact Dr Marcelle Dawson, marcelle.dawson@otago.ac.nz or 03 479 8113