Early Childhood Education in New Zealand: A hazard to child and teacher health?

Mike Bedford
with Susan Bates, Wyatt Page and Stuart McLaren

The Ministry of Education states that New Zealand has ‘among the best standards in the world for Early Childhood Education’. Against this claim there is evidence that physical conditions and employment practices are subjecting many children and teachers to environments potentially damaging to their physical, mental and emotional health, with possible long-term consequences.

Mike Bedford

Mike Bedford is a specialist in ECE Wellbeing and Design, and doctoral fellow, University of Otago, Wellington. Susan Bates is an ECE teacher and researcher. Associate Professor Wyatt Page and Dr Stuart McLaren both work in the School of Health Sciences, Massey University, Wellington.
