Crisis? What crisis?

An overview of the National-led Government's housing policies 2008 – 2017

Dr Ben Schrader

National entered government believing New Zealand's growing housing ownership and affordability crisis was primarily a problem of insufficient supply. It introduced numerous policies to increase housing supply and affordability, but by the end of its tenure the housing crisis had worsened rather than improved. What went wrong?

Dr Ben Schrader is a Wellington public historian with expertise in urban, housing and built heritage history. He is currently a team member of the Marsden-funded eviction project based in the Department of Public Health, University of Otago, Wellington.
