Cancer care journeys and clinical decision-making: An exemplar of Māori-centred research

Jeannine Stairmand, Cheryl Davies and Louise Signal

New research methodologies and frameworks have arisen in response to concerns by Māori about how research is undertaken with Māori. For example, Māori have questioned whose research agenda is advanced when research involving Māori is undertaken by non-Māori. Māori-centred research, a term coined by distinguished Māori researchers including Tā Mason Durie, is an example which has evolved in response to such concerns.

Jeannine, Cheryl and Louise will share their experiences of undertaking Māori-centered research as members of the Cancer and Chronic Conditions (C3) Research Group, using the HRC-funded three-year Cancer Care Journeys and Clinical Decision-making research programme as an exemplar.

Friday 28 September 2018 12.30 to 1.15
